Software updates usually follow a rough release schedule. The dates to watch out for are usually the release date plus fifteen days, which are the “golden days” when software updates are released at the first signs of a problem. Typically, the company will make a software update available to the public a short time before the release date, in a much-publicized manner. Then, within hours, the company will remove the program from its website without a word. As I mentioned earlier, Adobe has publicized the release of this MacBook Air Pro update, the only thing they did was to take it down a day before the actual date so you wouldn't have to go looking for it. And they totally removed it without an explanation. Depending on the performance of the computers, the updating process can take anywhere between fifteen minutes to an hour, depending on the size of the update. According to my Apple MacBook Air and my Windows 10 computer, the update was completed by 15 minutes. My Samsung keyboard for Windows seems to have the best performance of them all. If you want to be productive, you need to be able to work on a variety of different tasks, whether it's scanning a document, correcting an image, or something else entirely.
