It might sound like I have a problem with the new Photoshop but, to tell you the truth, I think they made it look even “easier.” I am happy that they finally removed the “confusing” menu of tools, and instead used the Photoshop icon at the top of the window. This way, it is a lot easier to see the buttons you need, and the ones that are used less are not really visible. Also, the new one-click selection tool means we can easily select a block of pixels within an image. It’s simple, clean and makes the selection process quicker and more accurate. The Add Layer dialogs are really smart. They auto-select the Perfect Match check box automatically and we can also set it manually for layers that we want to edit. This is so much better than the previous versions where we had to select each layer individually. New in Photoshop CS5 is a faster startup and shutdown (automatic shutdown if you close the application) of the application and “fast preview” previews. How this is “faster” is hard to tell at the moment as previewing times are still the same. I do find it strange that you can’t shrink previews to fit into a window. The double-click of an icon to show preview in the window also works in the same way as in LR. You basically dock the app in it’s own window unlike CS4. The dialogs such as the “Align Frames” dialog as well as the “Adjustments” dialog look again better than previous version. One thing that I liked though, in the view options, is that it clearly shows if the image is affected by the current “preset.” Another really good thing was the advantage of renaming files and saving directly as “.tiff”, a great file-type that equals png, gif or jpg. What I like most about Photoshop CS5 is that they started to flow with Windows and Linux, improving the OS handling of the application. To sum up, most features of the application work the same in CS5 as in previous versions, so if you’re using older Photoshop CS, you don’t need to pointlessly upgrade to CS5, just stay with the older version.
