Evaluation of a new point-of-care test for the diagnosis of Helicobacter pylori infection in children. The prevalence of Helicobacter pylori infection in children is lower than that in adults, and there is a scarcity of reliable and validated tests for rapid diagnosis in this population. The aim of this study was to evaluate a new point-of-care test for the diagnosis of H. pylori infection in children. Two hundred children were evaluated using the rapid urease test (RUT), which detects the presence of H. pylori urease activity in gastric biopsies, and a monoclonal antibody-based enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA), which detects a crude antigen extract of H. pylori. The prevalence of H. pylori infection in the studied population was 30% by RUT and 7% by ELISA. The positivity of RUT was significantly higher in patients with recurrent abdominal pain (48%) than in those without (7%; $P = 0.005$) and in those with duodenal ulcer (50%; $P = 0.003$) than in those without. The positivity of ELISA was significantly higher in patients with H. pylori infection (96%) than in those without (28%; $P = 0.001$). The sensitivity, specificity, and positive and negative predictive values of RUT and ELISA were 90%, 88%, 70%, and 97%, respectively, and 94%, 87%, 85%, and 96%, respectively. Our results demonstrate that ELISA is a reliable and accurate test for the rapid diagnosis of H. pylori infection in children. RUT is not very useful for this diagnosis.

Q: How to safely store large amounts of data in a single table for fast lookups

I have a table of indexes that I am storing in a single table to decrease the amount of network traffic. I am pulling up a list of indexes (which are integers) by their IDs and doing a lookup against a global table in the background, which contains all of my ID/lookup values. My plan is to change this code: `SELECT * FROM index WHERE id = '$id'` To this: `SELECT * FROM index WHERE id = '$id' LIMIT 1` Then, on some other page, I want to have a value of 1 for $id to retrieve the first index in the list. My question is, what's the best way to deal with large amounts of data being stored in a single table? If I have a million
